Morning

(LE MATIN)

63500 Corot

In the fore-ground a flower-enamelled field in front of a small lake, bounded on the horizon by a row of trees, veiled by the silvery mists of morning.

Against the clear bluish white sky is thrown out a group of fine trees, whose delicate foliage completely impregnated with the vapoury light of the morning sun who has already risen a little above the horizon.

Under these trees, on the edge of the small lake, in the middle of the picture, a young girl stooping, having a reddish fichu over her shoulders and a cap on her head, holds a young child by the hands.

On the left, a green bank crowned with trees. In the back-ground, through the mist, one sees the view of a town, and a church steeple; in the lake is reflected the row of trees of the middle distance producing in the water vapoury images.

A picture which charms by its delightful harmony of tone.

Evening

(LE SOIR)

60.000

Under the opal sky of a warm July evening, completely impregnated by the golden lights of the setting sun, who has already disappeared below the horizon, is thrown out an important group of warmly and powerfully coloured trees growing on the bending of a hill, which overlooks the country already plunged in the shades of evening.

In front of this group of trees, between two young birch trees whose slight forms, and light foliage are thrown out against the sky, is placed upon the shaft of a pillar the bust of the god Pan, turned towards the country.

A little lower to the right are coming forward young nymphs half naked, some having wreaths of flowers in their arms, dancing gracefully in honour of god Pan; others leading a young satyr, are bringing to the god presents of flowers and fruits which they are carrying in their arms, and on their head.

In the fore-ground a pond with tall grasses and flowers.

A picture of imposing style, charming and sublime colouring.

Beggar-women

9.800

(LES MENDIANTES)

In front of a cottage whose white-washed wall receives the light of the sun, three beggar-women are seated.

One seen in front, wearing a white head-dress is sitting with her back leaning against the wall.

Seen from the side is another with a reddish Madras kerchief on her head, dressed in a green corsage and a skirt of many colors. She is sitting and holds upon her knees the head of a child, apparently occupied in looking for vermin in its hair.

A third is seated on a stool before the open door of the cottage, in the doorway of which is a little girl, holding in her arms a baby.

A Tiger hunt.

(LA CHASSE AU TIGRE)

The scene passes in a deep gorge at the foot of huge rocks, and on the brink of a stream.

An Arab horseman who going to attack an enormous Royal tiger, is himself attacked by the beast, who springs at the breast of his horse.

The latter rears under the powerful claws of the tiger that has seized the right leg in his formidable teeth.

With his right arm the hunter encircles his horse's neck and seems to have a firm support, whilst with his left hand he tries to plunge an enormous spear into the body of the terrible animal.

Another hunter on foot, head and shoulders covered with a red burnous, approaches holding in his hand a large cutlass which he also prepares to plunge into the body of the enraged animal.

A third Arab hunter mounted on a white horse hastens to the help of the first one.

Superb picture full of action and of powerful coloring, one of the very best works of this great French colorist.

A Pack of Hounds 27.500

(LA MEUTE SOUS BOIS)

At the edge of a beech wood whose foliage yellowed by autumn, receives the rays of the sun, appears a large pack of hounds.

The pack thrown off, rush down a high steep bank; with noses protruded and tails in the air, the dogs warm to their work.

The sun catching their white coats spotted with black, and red, makes them shine brightly, and lights up vividly a piece of ground in the front, also the light smooth barks of two giant beeches to the right.

Other large beeches to the left are in shadow, with dashes of bright light, which give to the whole of this magnificent, and important picture an intense brilliancy.

The edge a of forest.

25.000

(LISIÈRE DE FORÊT)

Over a road which enters the forest amid large oaks, the rugged bark of whose mighty trunks is caught by the rays of the sun, a wood-cutter is disappearing.

The light and air penetrate through the large knotty branches, whose fantastically shaped arms interlace one another in the most picturesque manner.

Near are some young shoots, the leaves of which are reddened by Autumn. The mysterious silence of the forest is admirably expressed in this picture, one of the finest and most important of the Master.

A halt of Arab horsemen.

(UNE HALTE DE CAVALIERS ARABES)

In a sandy glade, where ends a high road which comes from the Wood, a troop of Arab horsemen have halted.

Some are still on their superb horses, others have dismounted and chat in groupes, while the remainder are seated or lying on the sand enveloped in their large white burnouses, some sleep in the sun.

During this time the horses are at liberty and watched by mounted horsemen.

In the back ground one perceives another troop of horsemen arrive at the top of the road, and just coming out of the wood.

On the right a curtain of large trees behind the cavaliers.

(UNE CHARGE D'ARTILLERIE)

Filling up the whole foreground of the picture are batteries of artillery drawn by horses at full gallop passing over the uneven ground at a furious speed. On the left other batteries are coming up and extending into the far distance. To the right in the background some batteries are unlimbered and firing.

One sees the white smoke and the light from the explosions.

A sombre sky overhangs the field of action. The blood red light of the setting sun, to the right accentuates still more the dramatic effect of this scene, which takes place in the mysterious obscurity of the twilight.

In the foreground, a young boy is advancing, beating a drum which is fastened over his shoulder by means of a broad leather strap.

He is dressed in a grayish vest, knee breeches, yellow shoes, and soft gaiters with large revers.

He wears a gray felt hat with a red feather on one side, and is looking in front of him.

On his right is a young man in a reddish close fitting coat, green belt and black felt hat, carrying on his right shoulder a large flag.

A little behind, a young woman is advancing towards a broad flight of stone steps, carrying on a tray a large glass of fantastical form, and followed by a domestic with a large bottle under his arm.

To her right is another person, bearing on his shoulder a kind of lance, or flagpole.

The Interior of a Tavern

(INTÉRIEUR DE CABARET)

Seated round a large table are several jolly drinkers.

To the left by a large door opening on a courtyard, an angry woman is going out, who, with an energetic gest of her extended left arm, orders her husband to come out of the tavern.

He, dressed in a large red vest, has risen, quite drunk and tries in stumbling to go out, in order to obey his irascible better-half, while a dog barks behind him.

The light, coming in by the open door, lights up vividly the drunkard, the head-dress of his wife and the floor of the tavern, and throws out the chiaro-oscuro of the depths of the room.

Numerous household utensils are on the ground.

The Guide.

(LE GUIDE. — ARMÉE DU RHIN ET DE LA MOSELLE, 1797)

A regiment of dragoons is coming out of a forest of beech trees, led by a young peasant in Alsatian costume, red waistcoat, knee breeches, and buckled shoes.

The guide is walking between two mounted dragoons, who seem to be watching him very closely.

One holds his naked sword in his hand, the pomel resting against his thigh and the blade upright.

The other who is on the guide's left holds him by a cord, one end of which is fastened to his arm, and the other to the saddle.

A number of dragoons follow behind, and all are descending a declivity covered with tall dry grasses.

They emerge from the left of the forest, whose trees the winter cold has stripped of their leaves. This composition is one of the richest and most important which the Master has produced.

The Love Letter

(LE BILLET DOUX)

A young gentleman carrying a sword at his side, has stopped near the wall of a castle. In his left hand he holds a letter, which he reads, and which he has just received from a young messenger, standing opposite to him and looking at him with attention, the head bare, his black hat between his hands, pressed against the bosom, in an attitude of respect and expectation.

The gentleman's face is most prepossessing and distinguished, there is also a wonderful delicacy of expression. He is standing slightly inclined towards the right, his hand raised to his chin, and the reading of the letter has brought upon his lips a bright smile of satisfaction.

He is dressed in greenish knee breeches embroidered with gold, red stockings, and shoes ornamented with red ribbons.

In a study, Molière is seated in a lowbacked leathern arm-chair, ornamented with brass nails, placed near an open window the light from which brightly illuminates the sitter.

He wears a long yellowish dressing gown thrown back from his crossed legs, leaving to be seen his knee breeches, red stockings, and yellow leather shoes.

His right arm is resting on the brick sill of the open window, the hand supporting his head which is slightly bowed. On his knee, held by the left hand, rests a large book with red edges, which he is reading attentively.

To the left a leather chair, on which are two books.

Through the open diamond paned window can be seen the sky and neighbouring country.

A Landscape. — Sunset.

(PAYSAGE. — COUCHER DE SOLEIL.)

Low sinks the sun in a gorgeous, richly coloured sky. Towards the horizon on the left, purple and golden clouds reflect their colours in the river which seems to run in fire.

In the foreground, a little hill clothed with luxuriant grasses, on which stands in admirable prominence a large oak, which is thrown out against the sky and frames as if it were the gilded clouds of the setting sun.

To the right on the top of the hill, like a curtain, is a group of young trees whose pale delicate foliage is of very fine tone. On the left a footpath ascends to the bank of the river; amongst the reeds is moored a large flat canoe or boat, in which are two persons, a woman seated, and a man standing up. In the background, on the other side of the river an horizon of large trees rises under the purple clouds of the sky.

One sees from afar, like specks the red of her dress and the white point of her cap.

The plain fades away in perspective as far as the horizon.

One can imagine there, this village of Barbizon where the great artist lived, and where he has painted so many master pieces.

Over the landscape is a magnificent sky full of large clouds, behind which disappears from time to time the sun already on his decline, forming a brilliant and golden centre of light, in the upper part to the right.

Flowers.... Flowers, who wishes flowers?

Amidst most superb and poetic scenery, lighted by the silvery beams of the moon, in the blue sky of a summer's evening, advances like a pale fantastic apparition the fair Ophelia.

She is clothed in a long white drapery, a wreath of samphars on her head from which falls all around on her shoulders with the flowers of her wreath her light fair hair, upon which play the pale beams of the moon.

She seems to glide over the grass near the lake, with raised head and fixed eyes, as if lost in vacancy.

In the violet-coloured sash which encircles her waist and falls a little in front, she holds up some flowers with her left hand.

In her right hand she also holds flowers which she absently scatters at the edge of the water in which the moon beams are reflected.

Between the slender fingers of her hand which falls over the cushion, a half blown corn flower shows out against the rosy back-ground, and recalls the light blue dreamy eyes of the charming young woman.

A little to the right in the back-ground flutters a white butterfly.

He is of life size, of brown color; the neck, the top of the head, the muzzle and the tips of the paws are white.

The light illuminates brightly the long white hair of the neck, also white gloves which are on the floor to the right, and upon which is laid a yellow cane.

The glass is framed in striped red and black plush.

A young Girl.

(JEUNE FILLE)

Her long fair hair falls in golden curls over her forehead and down her neck as far as the shoulders.

Exquisite head of a young girl, of a freshness and naïveté that Greuze alone has known how to render with seductive grace.

The fête of the Bucentaur.

(LA FÊTE DU BUCENTAURE)

The scene is overhung by a superb sky, whose bright warm blue is veiled by light reddish clouds which increase the transparency.

Lower down, beautiful luminous clouds move across the sky, and take a golden hue on a level with the roofs of the palaces which display their fine architecture on the border and all along the Grand Canal.

The painter has chosen the moment when the yearly fête is at its height.

The Grand Canal is covered with rich gondolas, barques and elegant boats filled with personages in brilliant costumes, the bright colors of which are rendered more striking by the dark waters of the Canal.

The windows of the palaces and even the roofs are crowded with people, giving to the fête an extraordinary animation.

The Bucentaur, a kind of state Galley, is in the background towards the centre, and forms a dais from which the Doge is about to throw his ring into the sea to consecrate his marriage with the Adriatic.

Very important composition of the master, of great vigour and of powerful coloration which recalls the great Venetian colorists.

He is dressed in a slashed silk pourpoint and full knee breeches, with a large black felt hat on his head.

He passes his bow across the violin which he holds against his breast below a white plaited collarette.

Looking smilingly in front of him, the head is slightly bent back with an expression of satisfaction.

On his right a young Dutch girl with a white head-dress and fichu approaches, in bending towards him, smiling affectionately and offering him a glass of white wine which she has just poured out of a flagon held in her right hand and which she replaces on a table covered with a bluish cloth.

Superb painting (en pleine pâte) with great intensity of light, it is one of the most agreeable subjects amongst the works of this master so highly appreciated by connoisseurs.

Bossuet and the Grand Dauphin of France.

(BOSSUET ET LE GRAND DAUPHIN DE FRANCE)

Standing, seen from the front, as far as the knees, the young prince has his left arm leaning on a pilastre. Seemingly speaking to somebody not seen in the picture, he accentuates his words with a gesture of the left hand, extended and open, pointing with the first finger.

The curls of his long brown hair fall upon his shoulders.

He is dressed in a small gray coat with gold buttons, covering an embroidered waistcoat.

At his neck a white lace cravat over a knot of rose coloured ribbon.

Over his right arm is thrown a yellow drapery which covers his full sleeve of white muslin.

At his feet a large brown spaniel raises his head towards the hand of the young prince.

On his right stands Bossuet in the dress of an abbe his left hand placed paternally on the shoulder of the Dauphin, holding with his right hand his black cassock. His bare head is seen almost in full, looking to the right, his grayish hair falling upon his neck.

The grace, the vigour, and the distinction of the painting as well as the beauty of the hands, recall why Nicolas de Largillière was surnamed the French Van Dyck at the court of Louis XIV.

This magnificent picture in perfect preservation, has remained during more than a century in a family at Bruges, first in Baron de Marenzi's deceased 1845, afterwards in that of his heiress, the dowager Donquers.

We particularly call the attention of museums to this superb picture of extreme preservation, one of the most interesting works of this great master, Several eminent art critics have given an enthous-

Seen nearly full face, just to the waist, the figure in full light, turned a little to the right, he is dressed in a kind of tight fitting red coat, showing a white plaited chemisette, with broad gold embroidery.

Round his neck hangs a collar terminated by a decoration which falls between the chemisette and the embroidery.

On his breast, below a leather strap is suspended a commander's whistle.

He wears a large flat black cap, from beneath which fall the curls of his long tawny hair, of the same colour as his fine turned up moustache.

With his right hand, whose fingers are in his belt, he holds the handle of a dagger. A small poniard is passed through his belt to the right.

Over his shoulders a large pelisse with broad bands of tawny fur.

The head expresses the will, energy, and courage of a man who does not fear to struggle with the elements.

Fine and important picture whose powerful execution and vigorous coloring, class it among the works of the finest epoch of the master. The learned D^r Bode, in his Study on Dutch painting (page 535) gives a description of this picture, and finds a striking analogy between it and the Portrait of a young man, in the Louvre, dated 1658, and therefore concludes that this Portrait of an Admiral must have been painted almost at the same time.

It belonged to the Marquis de Beausset and had been a long time in the possession of M. Josse Allard, father of Madame Crabbe.

In the country, on some rising ground, at the foot of large trunks of trees, the Holy Family is seated.

In the middle the Virgin clothed in a long red dress, a large greenish blue cloak thrown over her shoulders, the breast uncovered, the bosom bare which she presses to make the milk flow into the mouth of the Child, whom she holds on her knees, and whose head and shoulders are laid on a pillow which a little winged angel supports with up raised arms, seen from behind.

On the left Saint Anne, leaning against a carved cradle, holds with her hand the child St John.

The latter caresses Jesus who raises his left arm and hand to St John's face.

On the right St Joseph wrapped in a bluish gray cloak, holding a stick in his hand, leans forward looking at the scene.

A yellow flag fastened between two branches of a tree is hung over the Virgin.

One of the most charming compositions of the master, of a marvellous splendour of coloring.

A work of Rubens of such importance and beauty as this, is rarely to be met with in a private collection.

Several great artists, and very eminent experts have had occasion to see this picture, and to express their opinion on its incontestable qualities and authenticity.

The expert M. Roux du Cantal, certifies on the 28th July 1830, the following :

« After having examined with scrupulous attention, this « important production in all its details and principally in all
« its accessories, I have recognised that it comes entirely
« from the hand of Rubens; though this great master in his « numerous works was ordinarily aided by his pupils, I have

The experts of the French Royal Museums, M. Charles Paillet, and M. Nicolas Perignon, in a notarial certificate dated the 24th March 1836, affirm :

« That the said mentioned picture is really from the cele-
« brated Rubens, and one of his best executed paintings;
« being one of the most charming works that has come from
« the brush of this great painter and that this precious mas« terpiece by its fine composition, is of very great value and « deserves to figure in the best galleries. »

Eugène Delacroix, says : « This is the most « beautiful work of this great master, that I have « seen after « The tomb of St. James » (Tombeau de « St Jacques) the excellent style of which it re« calls. »

The artist M. Müller, exclaimed : « Oh! the « beautiful Rubens, it is a true, a real bouquet,
« a bunch of living flesh. It was painted when
« he returned from Italy... It is a « pearl... »

Paul Delaroche, member of the Institute writes the 21st September 1843: « After having examined « with the greatest care this picture representing a
« holy family, which belongs to M. Roëhn, I cer-
« tify to the best of my ability that this work is a « real Peter Paul Rubens. »

Baron Happers: « I proclaim aloud that after « the “Tomb of St. James” (Tombeau de St Jacques),
« painted in the same style, and at the same epoch,
« I have never seen anything so beautiful as this « holy family... how concise and complete it is;
« this picture is entirely from the hand of the mas« ter, and was probably painted fifteen years be« fore his death, when he returned from Italy after « having copied from Titien.

« This picture is a rare and admirable “ chef-
« d’œuvre ” and is worth much more than £4,000
« (100,000 francs). »

M. Elienne Leroy: « It is as beautiful as the « “ Tomb of St. James ”, and superior to that of the « Kneif family of Antwerp.

« It is a picture of great value which can only
« belong to a king or a museum. »

This picture belonged to M. Villeroud law adviser to king Louis XV, afterwards by succession to several members of this family, and later to the Marquis Jouvelha, and to M. Roëhn, painter (1836).

It has been in the possession of M. Prosper Crabbe since 1869.
